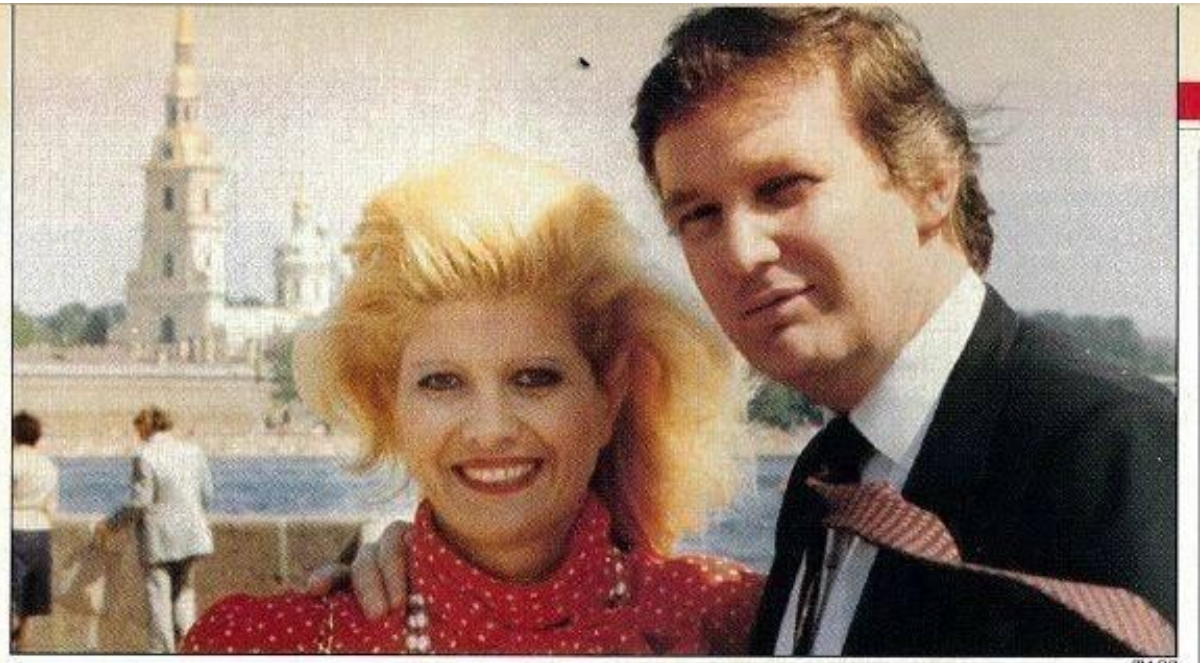
Don Putiniono

Ai



TASS

A real-estate mogul surveys Russia: Developer and wife on the town in Leningrad

Trump Lands in Red Square

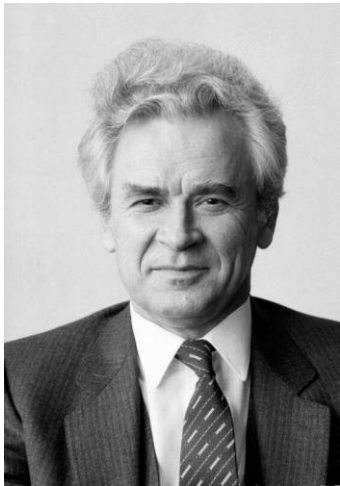
The Soviets want him to build two luxury hotels

Real-estate mogul Donald J. Trump stepped onto the circular balcony in his sumptuous corner suite at Moscow's National Hotel—and criticized the door. "This I can't understand," he said, pointing to layer upon layer of crusted brown paint. "But this," he said, making a sweeping gesture at the unsurpassed view of the Kremlin, "is fabulous."

The Soviets were astonished by daredev- building a Russian version. Soviet officials visited Trump in New York, inviting him on the all-expenses-paid trip. Trump saw a half-dozen sites in Moscow alone. The deal is far from done. Inveterate bargain hunter Trump might have met his match in the Soviets, who retain 51 percent ownership of all joint ventures. "I like to have control, to put it mildly," says Trump. Still, the idea of building two monuments in the U.S.S.R.

Trump was first compromised by the Russians back in the 80s. In 1984, the Russian Mafia began to use Trump real estate to launder money and it continued for decades. In 1987, the Soviet ambassador to the United Nations, Yuri Dubinin, arranged for Trump and his then-wife, Ivana, to enjoy an all-expense-paid trip to Moscow to consider possible business prospects.

Yuri Dubinin



The Russian Trump friends the Solntsevo criminal group

Russian organized crime are much wider than previously thought. Data from witnesses and investigative bodies from different countries, and found out what links Trump with organized crime figures Mikhas and Mogilevich, how the Russian mafia ended up integrated into the American president's team, and what the Russian special services had to do with it.

Back in 1984, a Russian émigré - David Bogatin - bought five luxury condominiums in the Trump Tower in New York for $ 6 million, becoming neighbors with Sophia Loren and Steven Spielberg. This occasion warranted Trump's personal attendance at the contract signing ceremony.

A mere three years later, Bogatin was found guilty of money laundering and tax evasion, and the apartments were seized in order to pay off the court-appointed fine. Bogatin's activities were also the subject of Senate hearings in 1996, where Senators were informed of his work for the organization of the criminal mastermind Semyon Mogilevich.

The Solntsevo gang members felt quite literally at home at the Trump Tower.

The famous thief in law Yaponchik (Vyacheslav Ivankov), who was killed in 2009 in Moscow, engaged in active criminal activity in New York in the 90s. The FBI had been hunting him for a long time, until it located him at the Trump Tower, where, as it turned out, he owned his own apartments.

From 1984 to the present day, a total of 13 criminal masterminds associated with Solntsevso OCG and its partner criminal organizations, owned real estate in the Trump Tower in New York, or at other Trump buildings. The main buyers of Trump real estate were clients from Azerbaijan, Russia and Kazakhstan. Most of the apartments belonged to offshore companies with opaque beneficial ownership.

Trump entered into a partnership with the development company Bayrock-Sapir, which was headed by Sam Kislin, Tamir Sapir, and they were directly or indirectly associated with organized crime.

Trump is linked to Emin Agalarov, who positions himself as a singer, and his father, billionaire Araz Agalarov, has never been a secret. According to the official version of events, Trump and Agalarov were introduced to one another by Miss Universe-2012, when Emin recorded a music video with her (as a result, Trump himself ended up starring in the video).

Emin Agalarov - who was the man behind the notorious meeting between Trump's staff and the Russian lawyer Natalya Veselnitskaya, where she was expected to offer dirt on Hillary Clinton (nowadays this meeting is one of the central plots of the investigation of special prosecutor Muller into potential Trump-Russia conspiracy).

In 2011-2013, the FBI bugged the headquarters of the so-called Nahmad-Taiwanchik-Trincher organization at the Trump Tower, located three floors below the penthouse of Donald Trump. The organization was suspected of laundering money by organizing illegal gambling. Helly Nahmad was the son of famous billionaire collector, the Monegasque of Lebanese descent David Nahmad. He pleaded guilty. Trump entered into a partnership with the development company Bayrock-Sapir, which was headed by Sam Kislin, Tamir Sapir, and they were directly or indirectly associated with organized crime.

The Russian Mafia is part and parcel of Russian intelligence. Russia is a mafia state. That is not a metaphor. Putin is head of the Mafia.

Trump was $4 billion in debt after his Atlantic City casinos went bankrupt. No U.S. bank would touch him. Then foreign money began flowing in through Bayrock. Bayrock was run by two investors: Tevfik Arif, a Kazakhstan-born former Soviet official who drew on bottomless sources of money from the former Soviet republic; and Felix Sater, a Russian-born businessman who had pleaded guilty in the 1990s to a huge stock-fraud scheme involving the Russian mafia. Bayrock partnered with Trump in 2005 and poured money into the Trump organization under the legal guise of licensing his name and property management.

Semion Mogilevich was the brains behind the Russian Mafia. Mogilevich operatives have been using Trump real estate for decades to launder money. That means Russian Mafia operatives have been part of his fortune for years, that many of them have owned condos in Trump Towers and other properties, running their operations out of Trump's crown jewel.

One of the most important things that is often overlooked is that the Russian Mafia is part and parcel of Russian intelligence. Russia is a mafia state. That is not a metaphor. Putin is head of the Mafia. So the fact that they operated out of the home of a president of the United States is deeply disturbing

Putin is head of The Mafia

4 Billion debt

Trump Plaza Hotel and Casino

Trump Plaza's revenues took a sharp decline in 1990, due to competition from its newly opened sister property, the Trump Taj Mahal, which was a mile away. The casino narrowly averted default on a 1991 payment to bondholders by taking out a $25 million mortgage on its parking garage. Trump then negotiated a debt restructuring with the Plaza's creditors, under which their $250 million of debt would be exchanged for $200 million of bonds with a lower interest rate, plus $100 million of preferred stock. The plan was submitted as a prepackaged bankruptcy in March 1992.

The Trump Plaza Hotel and Casino was imploded on February 17, 2021. It became the second hotel-casino in Atlantic City to be demolished by an implosion after the Sands Hotel and Casino in 2007.